I think there is no single best way to get rid of procrastination. If you want to overcome procrastination, doing combos of techniques would be more effective, I think. I mean, it is not enough to make a list of things to do without actually doing it, for you to effectively implement your plans, there must be enough motivation, action, goal etc. "Time Management" gave 16 easy ways to improve your time management skills and eventually overcome procrastination. If you are experiencing time management issues and procrastination, get encouraged, motivated and enlightened by this book. Let it show you how to get to the path of maximum productivity.

Developing time management skills is a journey. One goal is to help ourselves become aware of how we use our time as one resource in organizing. And it seems that there's really a need to have some me time. This book says it so, just like the previous advice I'm getting. With all the things that I'm dealing with, I don't have the luxury to think about myself, instead I sleep it all away because I'm always tired. Haha The only thing that I find confusing from Henry's advice is doing things half way would make good habits, because that is not the case for me. I have to do everything all at once because if I don't, chances are, I'd be lazy to finish it all up.

Some very useful tricks that I could apply. But it needs time and patience to decrease procrastination, the most important is your self.

This book is good if you've never read a time management book before. If you have, I did not see anything new.
